New York returns $19 million worth of stolen art to Italy

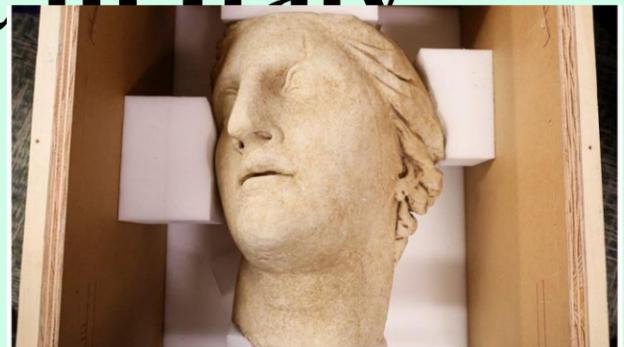

New York district attorney has returned $19m (£14m) worth of stolen art to Italy.

The 58 pieces include a marble head of the goddess Athena dated 200 BC, worth an estimated $3m alone. The stolen artefacts were sold on to museums and private dealers by convicted looters, said Mr Alvin Bragg. It is the city's latest effort to return plundered goods to their country of origin - $66m worth have been returned so far this year.

Homeland Security was part of the investigation to seize and repatriate these objects to the Italians - 21 of these came from the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Although, the pieces have immense monetary value, an Italian police commander described them as "priceless". Gen Roberto Riccardi said he felt especially happy knowing that these objects would be returning to communities, who would know "where we come from, about our history, about our identity". Investigators had worked for years to track down the art smugglers' trails and locate the items that were being repatriated, according to Homeland Security officials.

Pandora has unveiled a new creative jewellery collection in collaboration with the artist Keith Haring

The collection named 'Keith Haring X Pandora' is inspired by the artist's principles of love for all and features 12 jewellery pieces consisting of eight bracelet charms, two rings, a necklace, and earrings.

The pieces crafted in reflection of the New York culture 1980s highlighted by its distinct bright yet bold tones, mixed metals and colours. Haring was inspired by the city's graffiti artists whose marks covered New York subway trains.
